Report:

Chatterjee started his presentation with the definition and explanation of plasma. Matter changes its state when energy is supplied to it, solid become liquid and liquids become gaseous. If even more energy is supplied to a gas, it is ionized and goes into the energy rich plasma state, the fourth state of matter. He also discussed about medical application of plasma technology. The ability to produce cold plasma at atmospheric pressure conditions was the basis for rapid growth of plasma related application areas in biomedicine. For medical applications two different types of cold plasma appear suitable: indirect (plasma jet) and direct (dielectric barrier discharge-DBD) plasma sources.

Report:

In recent years, colloidal cesium lead halide (CsPbX₃) perovskite nanocrystals (PNCs) have attracted significant attention from researchers due to their unique optical properties and potential use in optoelectronic applications. In colloidal synthesis, oleic acid and oleylamine are commonly used as surface-capping ligands. Although oleylamine plays a crucial role in maintaining the colloidal stability and surface passivation of PNCs, its dynamic equilibrium with oleic acid leads to the formation of labile oleylammonium, which pulls halides from the surface of PNCs and thus degrades the crystals. In this Perspective, we summarize the various approaches for eliminating the amines to make high-quality, photostable, and amine-free CsPbX₃ PNCs. In addition, we look over the prospects of these PNCs regarding stability in different environmental conditions, photoluminescence properties, and optoelectronic device performance. This perspective will give a broad overview of amine-free PNCs starting from their synthesis, challenges, and optoelectronic properties to their future prospects
